

Do my Homework

"To keep a child busy with homework is to deprive them of the opportunity to look for things that are interesting."

When I was a kid, homework was a sacrifice for me. I sacrificed my free time to the teachers, and I didn't have much of it. At first I did all my assignments, but somehow that didn't make me learn any better.

I think the homework was not so much useful for our understanding of the subject as it was necessary to tame our character. "You behave badly, I'll give you more homework," our teachers would say and lavish us with exercises and problems. Why save money? The textbook is big, there are a lot of assignments. Those who did not want to sacrifice their time and did not do their homework were punished with F's, a parental summons, and even expulsion from the Pioneer Organization, which, however, by that time was already breathing heavily.

We dragged the yoke along, doing our homework anyway and copying off each other.

Back in the '90s, for us who did not know computers and the Internet, doing homework was a very dubious occupation-they were useful only to those who did them independently, and who were encouraged and checked while doing them.

But the plight of homework now can hardly even be compared with those times. Nowadays, kids have cheat sheets and assigning assignments from a textbook is simply useless. They have the Internet, and so offering to write an essay or report, especially in printed form, is homework not for the child, but for the printer. In the last few years, there have been so many powerful online packages for solving all kinds of math, physics and chemistry problems, spell-checking and translating into any language that homework has turned into a "cheat in a notebook" quest for most kids.

This situation is not only tragic in itself, but also has dangerous consequences. Many teachers learn from parents that homework takes children a minimum amount of time, and, noticing that grades are falling rather than rising, set more and more assignments "to work on skills. This completely knocks the ground out from under the feet of the few children who do assignments on their own, pushing them to the easy way out. Agree - it's easier to assign more assignments from a textbook than it is to try to come up with assignments that can't be cheated off. That way the kids are in business, their notebooks are scribbled, and their homework grades are good. And the fact that they don't know the topic well, you can't see it right away psychology homework help & answers.
